Not illustrated. 1834 edition. Excerpt: ...d so rapidly as presently to overtake his little daughter, Martha, who had left the factory somewhat earlier. He saw her before him for some distance, and observed how she limped, and how feebly she made her way along the street, (if such it might be called,) which led to their abode. It was far from easy walking to the strongest. There were heaps of rubbish, pools of muddy water, stones and brickbats lying about, and cabbage-leaves on which the unwary might slip, and bones over which pigs were grunting and curs snarling and fighting. Little Martha, a delicate child of eight years old, tried to avoid all these obstacles; but she nearly slipped down several times, and started when the dogs came near her, and shivered every time the mild spring breeze blew in her face. Martha, how lame you are to-day! said Allen, taking her round the waist to help her onward. O father, my knees have been aching so all day, I thought I should have dropped every moment. And one would think it was Christmas by your looks, child, instead of a bright May day. It is very chill after the factory, said the little girl, her teeth still chattering. Sure the weather must have changed, father. No; the wind was south, and the sky cloudless. It was only that the thermometer had stood at 75 within the factory. I suppose your wages are lowered as well as mine, said Allen; how much do I you bring home this week? Only three shillings, father; and some say it will be less before long. I am afraid mother The weak-spirited child could not say what it was that she feared, being choked by her tears. Come, Martha, cheer up, said her father. Mother knows that you get sometimes more and sometimes less; and, after all, you earn as much as a piecer as some do at the hand-loom. There...
